Hay (Earl of Erroll. "In the reign of Kenneth III.," says Douglas, "about 980, the Danes having invaded Scotland, were encountered by that King near Loncarty, in Perthshire; the Scots at first gave way, and fled through a narrow pass, where they were stopped by a countryman of great strength and courage, and his two sons, with no other weapons than the yokes of their ploughs; upbraiding the fugitives for their cowardice, he succeeded in rallying them; the battle was renewed, and the Danes totally discomfited. It is said that after the victory was obtained, the old man lying on the ground, wounded and fatigued, cried 'Hay, Hay:' which word became the surname of his posterity; the King, as a reward of that signal service, gave him as much land in the Carse of Gowrie as a falcon should fly over before it settled; and a falcon being accordingly let off, flew over an extent of ground six miles in length, afterwards called Errol, and lighted on a stone, still called Falcon-stone; the King also assigned three shields or escutcheons for the arms of the family, to intimate that the father and the two sons had been the three fortunate shields of Scotland." Ireland, Kingdom of. Az. a harp or, stringed ar. The ancient arms of the kingdom after the invasion of 1172 were, "As. three crowns or." This was the coat of St. Edmund, and it is possible the Anglo-Norman invaders, who were arrayed under the banners of St. George and St. Edmund, introduced the bearings of the latter saint as the ensigns of their new conquest. When Richard II. created Robert De Vere, Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, he gave him as a coat of augmentation the arms of Ireland, viz., "Az. three crowns or." Henry VIII. relinquished the old arms for the "harp" when he declared himself King of Ireland, from an apprehension, it is said, that the three crowns might be taken for the triple tiara of the Pope. Since James I. introduced the arms of Ireland among the quarterings of the Royal achievement, the bearing has been "Az. a harp or, stringed ar." From a MS. in the handwriting of Sir William Le Neve, Clarenceux, it appears on the authority of Sir William Segar, Garter, that "Ye three crowns are ye antient arms of Ireland, the harp but an ancient badge," and "In ye tyme of Edward ye IVth a commission being to enquire the arms of Ireland it was returned yt ye 3 crownes were the armes." The same bearing appears on the reverse of ancient Irish coins. Another ancient coat, as recorded in Ulster's Office, is, Sa. a king sitting on his throne cross-legged, holding in his right hand a lilly or. Crest—A tower triple-towered or, from the portal a hart springing ar. attired and hoofed gold. The badge, as settled at the Union with Great Britain, is the harp ensigned with the imperial crown. A MS. in the British Museum, Add. MSS. 4814, f. 8, exhibits a banner on either side of the shield, viz., dexter, sa. a king enthroned in his chair of state with a sceptre in his right hand and his left leaning on a cushion all ar.; sinister, gu. a house triple-chimneyed, smoke issuant or, a stag in the port of the first, and a tree on the dexter side of the second.

While conversing with the Prince after the fight, LLEWELYN accidentally drew his left hand, smeared with blood, across his sword, leaving four blood-stains upon it, which the Prince observing, ordered him to bear those marks henceforth on his shield, at the same time conferring upon him, as a substantial recognition of his services, the lordship of Gelligynan. The first edition of the Armory makes the battle that of Crogen, but Reynolds says it was Corwen; and it is simply impossible it could have been Crogen, which was fought nearly a century before the grant made to LLEWELYN. Besides, LLEWELYN was certainly contemporary with Gryffyd, Lord of Dinas Bran, whose grandfather, Gryffyd Maelor, a distinguished chief, took part, along with Owen Brogyntyn, at the battle of Crogen, and died 30 years later, in 1191, the date of Crogen being 1165.]
